

Health care in our country is in serious need of reform. Obamacare has not delivered on its promises to reduce costs, expand choice, and increase access to care. Instead, too many American families are faced with the difficult choice of spending more than they can afford on health insurance or paying the fine for going without.

I'm dedicated to repealing Obamacare and replacing it with something that stops the unsustainable premium hikes, expands choice in the insurance market, and encourages innovative ideas for providing consistent, holistic care for patients that will lower healthcare costs.

I believe that we should retain protections for patients with pre-existing conditions and coverage for our young people that are struggling to find jobs with insurance in this stagnant economy.

Too much of this debate has come down to rhetoric and talking points, but here's the bottom line: Obamacare has failed, so it's time to repeal it and move forward with a replacement that works for the American people.

Sincerely,

Rob Wittman
